Rationale for proposed amendment:

The content of this module is broad and it covers a range of insights from economics and behavioural economics relevant to projects. As the module is more about breadth than depth it will not be possible to properly assess the students' command of the material through one term paper because a term paper would necessarily have to focus just on a small sub-section of the material covered. An exam will enable us fully to assess the students' knowledge and command of all elements of this module.

The original plan had been to have an exam but the problem of consultation with current part-timers about a change in assessment emerged – so initially we had to settle for a less satisfactory form of assessment for the first year of this module. Now, for timetabling reasons, the plan has shifted so that the current part-timers will take this module's predecessor (BENVGCM1) for the 2014/15 academic year as they'd expected and they will not be affected by the form of assessment for BENVGPML. The first part-timers will take this module in 2015/16 and will be informed before enrolling of the assessment method – at the same time that they are informed about assessment methods for their other modules.
